ABSTRACT

This article considers the influence that assessment exerts on poetry education. By means of research conducted in a post-16 educational context in Malta, it shows that teachers' and students' practices in the poetry lesson are determined by the kind of examinations that candidates sit for. When the mode of assessment is constituted solely by the traditional essay test that excludes students' personal response, their engagement with poetry might be impaired and teachers' role becomes highly pronounced. The article demonstrates how assessment plays a key role in governing teachers' and students' practices in the classroom. However, it is also argued that other factors are equally responsible for their approach to poetry.

KEYWORDS: assessment, literature examinations, essay writing, poetry education.

1. INTRODUCTION

The emphasis placed on assessment in poetry education might undermine students' engagement with poetic texts and hinder the reading of poetry for personal pleasure (Benton, 1999, 2000; Dymoke, 2001, 2002, 2012, 2013; O'Neill, 2006, 2008). In English Studies, one of the traditional ways of assessing students' knowledge of poetry has for long been the essay, either as an assignment or else as part of an examination. In contexts like Malta the essay is sometimes construed as the only means of engaging students with a poem and they are most often discouraged from describing and analyzing their own thoughts and feelings about an unseen poem or a number of poems by a particular poet. However, the washback of
